You don't want to sell yourself short, but you also need to make sure you don't come off as too full of yourself either. It's for that reason leaders need to learn how to write a performance review using these guidelines. Regular Feedback is Critical While a performance review typically has a bi-annual schedule, that doesn't mean regular feedback in-between those dates shouldn't be happening. Instead, frame these situations as learning experiences, taking responsibility and making specific goals to succeed. If you have many criteria, you may wish to number each criterion for clarity. It's essential to keep policies on-hand, like a cash management policy sample or sample IT policies, for example, to ensure they're up-to-date and ready to present during the performance review.
